High-quality child care is essential for a vibrant, thriving city. It provides a powerful pathway to growing the human capital of a prosperous and sustainable community. It strengthens the workforce and local economy by allowing parents to work, build a career, and pay their bills. It also provides young children with experiences that support school readiness and nurture their cognitive, social, and emotional growth.

In recent weeks, the value of early care and education has become top-of-mind for many members of our community, including those who struggle to balance remote working while home with young children. The lack of high-quality early care and education in Portland – and across Maine – will likely worsen as a result of COVID-19.

According to a March survey conducted by the Maine Association for the Education of Young Children, 88% of licensed child care programs that responded said they would not survive or were unsure if they could reopen if they remained closed for one to two months. While Portland Works for Kids is striving to address some immediate issues caused by the pandemic, especially regarding child care access for essential personnel, the shortage of child care is not a new problem in Portland.

Portland Works for Kids is working to address the short- and long-term aspects of the shortage, including advocating for support for providers. Short-term, increasing access will help the workforce get back up and running as soon as it is safe. Long-term, research has shown that quality child care yields better academic and social outcomes for children, safer and healthier communities, a better prepared future workforce, and less spending on social services.

WHO WE ARE
Portland Works for Kids is a community-wide effort comprised of dozens of partners working together to make high-quality early childhood care and education affordable and accessible to everyone. Concerned community members are aligning efforts across sectors, including businesses and employers, health care professionals, non-profit organizations, early childhood care and education providers, parents, caregivers, and neighbors.

WHAT WE DO
Portland Works for Kids convenes local leaders and stakeholders, shares resources, combines efforts, and collects local data to help identify specific areas of need and inform strategies. Right now, Portland Works for Kids is comprised of four working groups along with several ad-hoc committees and related initiatives:

• Workforce Development to support training and increased pay for early childhood care and education providers
• Quality Improvement to increase the number of affordable, high-quality programs
• Revenue Task Force to identify and create new funding sources
• Advocacy Committee to conduct outreach and education with city leadership, business owners, and community members to support policy and systems changes

“High quality child care is essential for a vibrant, thriving community. It strengthens the workforce and local economy by allowing parents to work and pay their bills. It also provides young children with experiences that support school readiness and nurture their cognitive, social, and emotional growth.”
